Dear Readers,

We are thrilled to announce that the second issue of the International Journal of Sexual Science has been published and is now available to you, our esteemed readers. Continuing our commitment to sharing cutting-edge scientific studies in sexual health, reproductive health, and mental health, this issue further enriches the knowledge in these critical fields.

This issue features a diverse range of original articles that explore topics such as the effects of using a uterine manipulator during hysterectomy, the most dangerous sexual positions that can lead to penile fracture, a new hypnotherapeutic approach to treating vaginismus, and the impact of post-TURP orgasm disorder on male sexual satisfaction.

Additionally, we are proud to present a comprehensive review article that delves into the concepts of sexual selection and dimorphism, examining the connections between sex, body, and mind.

As the International Journal of Sexual Science, we strive to be a dynamic international publishing platform that continually evolves with contributions from the academic world and health professionals.

We sincerely invite all researchers to submit their articles to our journal and join us in our mission to advance sexual science.
